For much of human history, people have lived under the rule of kings or other rulers who held absolute power. A direct contrast is the system of democracy, in which people govern themselves through councils and agreed-upon laws. The earliest democracies arose in ancient Greece and Rome.

Ancient Greece had a (limited) form of direct democracy. In a direct democracy, citizens represent themselves directly at councils. Ancient Rome saw the rise of the republic—an indirect democracy in which citizens rule through representatives, whom they elect. Many countries today, including the United States, use the republic form of democracy.

Greco-Roman Views

- Citizens should participate in government by voting, debating in public, making laws, serving on juries, and holding office.
- The world has natural laws—patterns that can be discovered through reason and intellect, rather than superstition.
- Democracy can be protected by having branches of government:
 - a legislative branch to make laws,
 - an executive branch to approve laws,
 - a judicial branch to resolve legal disputes.
- There should be written law.

The development of democracy was supported by Judeo-Christian ideas, which spread in two main ways:

- After the Jews were exiled from Israel in A.D. 70, they brought their beliefs with them to their new lands.
- As Christianity spread throughout the Roman Empire, especially in the A.D. 400s, it became the dominant religion in Europe.

Judeo-Christian Views

- Every person is born with worth and dignity because they were created by God.
- Every person has the ability to choose between doing good and doing wrong.
- Every person has the responsibility to help others in need and the community.
